Commenting on behalf of an organization

General Comment: In our efforts to distinguish the judicial branch of government from the others, which find themselves the target of such vehement public backlash, we can ill afford to endorse the typical “government” practice of engaging in illogical and impractical actions, such as commissioning a self-analytical review of ourselves and, then, summarily rejecting it by “sending it to committee for further review” when we are challenged by the conclusions reached in that self-initiated process.

We should stand up, and be the adults in the room, by asserting leadership in government by accepting our self-identified shortcomings and moving forward expeditiously in resolving the problems that confront us. To do otherwise simply casts us in the same dim light as other parts of “government” that the public, rightly and vocally, disfavors.
