PETITION FOR REVIEW

TO: THE HONORABLE TANI CANTIL-SAKAUYE, CHIEF JUSTICE, AND THE HONORABLE ASSOCIATE JUSTICES OF THE SUPREME COURT OF THE STATE OF CALIFORNIA:

Pursuant to Rule 8.500 of the California Rules of Court, petitioner, Timothy Wayne Johnson, respectfully requests this Court to review the published decision of the Court of Appeal, Second Appellate District, Division Three, which affirmed the denial of petitioner's Penal Code section 1170.126 petition for recall of his Third Strike, life sentence.

Review is necessary to resolve important questions of law. The issues presented involve interpretation of the new sentencing recall statute to resolve questions of eligibility. Penal Code section 1170.126 is designed to apply to thousands of inmates who were given Third Strike sentences for non-violent or serious offenses. As a result, thousands of petitions have been and will continue to be filed and resolved by the trial courts. These petitions give rise to questions of eligibility and have demonstrated ambiguities in the statute that must be clarified to enable the new law to be applied effectively. Thus, the questions as to eligibility are important questions of law that are likely to recur.

The Court of Appeal's opinion, filed May 23, 2014, was ordered published. A copy of the opinion is attached and designated as "Opinion." No Petition for Rehearing was filed.

QUESTIONS PRESENTED FOR REVIEW

1. For purposes of determining a defendant's eligibility for the recall of his sentence pursuant to Penal Code section 1170.126, which definition of violent or serious felony controls, that in effect in 2012 or that in effect at the time of the commission of the offense for which the defendant is serving the sentence to be recalled?

NECESSITY FOR REVIEW

Proposition 36 provided major reform of the Three Strikes Law and enacted Penal Code section 1170.126 to enable certain inmates serving third strike sentences to petition to have their sentences reduced under the new act. At the time Proposition 36 was passed, it was anticipated that some 3000 inmates would qualify to petition for a sentence recall. Those inmates' petitions are now working their way through the system. As they do, questions arise as to the interpretation of the eligibility requirements of the statute. The lower courts have been addressing these questions and have not been entirely consistent in doing so. Thus, as these questions are likely to recur, this Court should step in to resolve them.

This case presents one such important issue. Penal Code section 1170.126 limits eligibility for a recall petition to those inmates whose sentence under the current Three Strikes Law would not have been an indeterminate life sentence. The primary limitation on eligibility is that the current offense is not violent or serious. Because the definition of violent or serious has changed since the Three Strikes Law was first enacted, some crimes that were neither violent nor serious when committed have been later defined as violent or serious. Some of the inmates petitioning for a sentence recall have crimes that were committed before the revisions to the definitions of violent or serious crimes were enacted. Therefore, a question arises as to what definition of serious or violent felony governs, that in effect at the time of the commission of the offense on which the defendant is sentenced or that in effect at the current time.

In 2000, numerous crimes were added to the list of serious felonies. (See Manduley v. Superior Court (2002) 27 Cal.4th 537, 574-575.) At the same time, Penal Code section 1170.125 was enacted to explain that, for crimes committed after its effective date, the definitions of serious or violent felonies for purposes of the Three Strikes Law would be the new definition. Courts later clarified that the controlling date for which definition of violent or serious felonies applied to determine whether a defendant could be sentenced under the Three Strikes Law was the date of the commission of the current offense. (See People v. James (2001) 91 Cal.App.4th 1147, 1151; see also Manduley v. Superior Court, supra, 27 Cal.4th at pp. 574-575.) This meant, for crimes committed before the effective date of the new definition, the definition of violent or serious felonies for purposes of the Three Strikes Law was the old definition that had been in effect at the time of the commission of the offense. (See In re Jenson (2001) 92 Cal.App.4th 262, 266, fn. 3.)

Now, with the enactment of Proposition 36 and Penal Code section 1170.126, Penal Code section 1170.125 has been amended to provide that for crimes committed on or after November 7, 2012, the definitions of violent and serious felonies are those in effect as of November 7, 2012. In so doing, section 1170.125, states that this rule applies to both section 1170.12, which governs new Three Strikes sentences, and section

1170.126, which governs the recall of Three Strike sentences under Proposition 36. This seemingly means that for purposes of recall eligibility, the date of the commission of the crime being sentenced would govern the definition of serious or violent felonies. (In re Jenson, supra, 92 Cal.App.4th at p. 266, fn.3; People v. James, supra, 91 Cal.App.4th at p. 1151; see also Manduley v. Superior Court, supra, 27 Cal.4th at pp. 574-575.) Yet, the Court of Appeal in this case, held the opposite, that the present definition of serious or violent felony governs irrespective of whether the crime being sentenced was serious or violent when committed. The Court of Appeal in Braziel v. Superior Court (2014) 225 Cal.App.4th 933, petition for review pending in S218503, reached the same conclusion. A third court, Second District, Division Two, in an unpublished opinion in case B251204, reached the opposite conclusion, consistent with the statutory language and case interpretations, that the governing definition is that in effect at the time of the commission of the offense being sentenced.¹

Thus, as the lower appellate courts appear to be split, and as both of the published decisions reached the wrong conclusion, this Court should grant review and clarify that, for purposes of Penal Code section 1170.126, eligibility for recall is governed by the

^{1/} Petitioner recognizes that unpublished decisions may not be cited as authority or relied upon to support a legal argument. (Cal. Rules of Court, rule 8.1115) Petitioner is not citing this decision for its persuasive authority, but is merely noting its existence to demonstrate to this Court that the lower appellate courts are addressing this recurring issue and not reaching consistent results. definitions of serious or violent felonies in effect at the time of the commission of the current offense. (Cal. Rules of Court, rule Rule 8.500 (b)(1).)

ARGUMENT

FOR PURPOSES OF DETERMINING ELIGIBILITY FOR A SENTENCE RECALL UNDER PENAL CODE SECTION 1170.126, THE DEFINITION OF SERIOUS OR VIOLENT FELONY IN EFFECT AT THE TIME OF THE COMMISSION OF THE CURRENT OFFENSE CONTROLS

Proposition 36 amended the Three Strikes law to dilute it such that life sentences are reserved for “cases where the current crime is a serious or violent felony or the prosecution has pled and proved an enumerated disqualifying factor. In all other cases, the recidivist will be sentenced as a second strike offender.” (People v. Yearwood (2013) 213 Cal.App.4th 161, 167-168.) Penal Code section 1170.126 was also enacted to create the mechanism by which a defendant serving a Third Strike sentence that would not have been a life sentence under the new law can obtain a recall of his sentence and be resentenced as a second strike offender. (Ibid.)

The question presented by this petition is which definition of “serious” and “violent” felony is to be used for purposes of determining whether the defendant’s current offense disqualifies him from a sentencing recall. The Court of Appeal here concluded that, although petitioner would get only a second strike sentence if he were being sentenced for his current crime in an “original” sentencing proceeding, Penal Code section 1170.126 does not apply to him because his offense, which was not a violent or serious felony when committed, is currently defined as serious. This conclusion directly conflicts with Penal Code section 1170.126, subdivision (a), that states, “The resentencing provisions under this section and related statutes are intended to apply exclusively to persons presently serving an indeterminate term of imprisonment pursuant to paragraph (2) of subdivision (e) of Section 667 or paragraph (2) of subdivision (c) of Section 1170.12, whose sentence under this act would not have been an indeterminate life sentence.” (Emphasis added.) It also conflicts with the language of the Three Strikes statutes themselves as well as with settled rules of statutory construction.

The Court of Appeal stated that the “plain language” of section 1170.126 makes it clear that only the current definitions violent and serious felonies apply to determine whether a defendant is entitled to a sentence recall. This conclusion was premised on the fact that, when referring to serious or violent felony convictions, section 1170.126 uses the present tense. (Slip opn. at p. 10) By this reasoning, however, the plain language of section 667 and 1170.12 makes it clear that only current definitions apply to sentencing pursuant to those statutes. Both section 667 and section 1170.12 are written in the present tense. Penal Code section 667, subdivision (e), and Penal Code section 1170.12, subdivision (c), both state that the Three Strikes sentencing scheme “shall apply where a defendant has one or more prior serious and/or violent felony convictions. . . .” (Emphasis added.) Thus, both statutes are written in the present tense; they do not say where the defendant “had” prior violent or serious felonies. Yet, pursuant to Penal Code sections 667.1 and 1170.125 as interpreted by the courts, the present definition of violent or serious felonies does not control; the definition in effect at the time of the commission of the current offense control.

The definition used to determine whether a conviction is a “strike” for purposes of the Three Strikes Law has always been the definition in effect at the time of the commission of the current offense. (See People v. James (2001) 91 Cal.App.4th 1147, 1151; see also Manduley v. Superior Court (2002) 27 Cal.4th 537, 574-575; In re Jenson (2001) 92 Cal.App.4th 262, 266, fn.3.) This is because, when the statutes defining serious and violent felonies have been amended to add crimes to these definitions, Penal Code section 667.1 and 1170.125 have provided that, for purposes of the Three Strikes Law, the new definitions would apply to all crimes committed “on or after” the effective date of the amendments. (See Manduley v. Superior Court, supra, 27 Cal.4th at pp. 574-575.) As a result, whether the defendant’s prior felony qualified as a “strike” so as to increase his sentence on a new offense is based upon the definition of violent or serious felonies in effect as of the date of the current offense, irrespective of whether the prior offense was a “strike” when the prior was committed. (See People v. James, supra, 91 Cal.App.4th at p. 1151; compare In re Jenson, supra, 92 Cal.App.4th at p. 266, fn. 3 [noting that an offense added to the list of juvenile offenses that could be “strikes” after the commission of the current offense did not affect that case].)

Section 1170.125 was enacted in 2000 when Proposition 21 changed the definition of violent and serious felonies to include more offenses, including petitioner’s current offense of making criminal threats. (See Manduley v. Superior Court, supra, 27 Cal.4th at p. 577.) Its purpose was to clarify that going forward the definition of “strikes” would change to include the newly added violent and serious felonies. (Id. at pp. 574-577; Slip opn. p. 10.) The previous controlling definition was that in effect as of June 30 1993.²

After 2000, many defendants argued that their prior convictions that had not been “strikes” before the passage of Proposition 21 should not be treated as “strikes” thereafter. The courts consistently ruled that the date of the commission of the prior “strike” offense was not controlling, and that rather, based upon the language of Penal Code sections 667.1 and 1170.125, so long as the “current offense” was committed “on or after” the effective date of the amendment declaring an offense to be a violent or serious felony, any prior conviction for an offense fitting the definition was a “strike” irrespective of when the prior offense was committed. (See People v. James, supra, 91 Cal.App.4th at p. 1151; People v. Superior Court (Andrades) (2003) 113 Cal.App.4th 817, 826-830; compare In re Jenson, supra, 92 Cal.App.4th at p. 266, fn.3.) Thus, for purposes of the Three Strikes Law, the question of whether an offense was violent or serious was answered based upon the definition of violent or serious in effect at the time of the commission of the offense then being punished. (See Pen. Code, §§ 667.1, 1170.125; People v. James, supra, 91 Cal.App.4th at p. 1151; People v. Superior Court (Andrades), supra, 113 Cal. App.4th at pp. 826-830; In re Jenson, supra, 92 Cal.App.4th at p. 266, fn. 3; see also People v. Ringo (2005) 134 Cal.App.4th 870, 884.)

^{2/} Section 2 of Proposition 184 provided that “[a]ll references to existing statutes are to statutes as they existed on June 30, 1993.” Penal Code section 667, the Legislature-enacted parallel provision creating Three Strikes sentencing, also initially indicated that the controlling definitions were those in effect on June 30, 1993. (Pen. Code, § 667, subd. (h).) In 2000, Penal Code section 667.1 was enacted along with section 1170.125 to move the 1993 date set for the controlling definitions for crimes committed after the effective date of Proposition 21. Both sections have now been amended to update the definitions as of November 2012 for crimes committed thereafter.

The only purpose for sections 667.1 and 1170.125 was to make sure that this was so. Thus, when the most recent amendments were made to the Three Strikes Law after the passage of Proposition 36, both sections were amended to state that, for all crimes committed “on or after” its effective date, the definitions of violent or serious felonies for purposes of the Three Strikes Law were those currently in effect. Seemingly to clarify that the same rule should apply for the entire Three Strikes scheme, Penal Code section 1170.125 included section 1170.126 in its purview.

The Court of Appeal recognized that the definition of violent or serious felony for purposes of the Three Strikes Law had changed over time and that the changes in definition had always applied prospectively to offenses committed on or after the effective date of the changes. (See Manduley v. Superior Court, supra, 27 Cal.4th at pp. 574-575.) (Slip opn. at pp. 11-13) The Court of Appeal found this prospective application to be necessitated by ex post facto principles. (Slip opn. at p. 13) The appellate court went on to note that excluding petitioner from a sentence recall based upon the current definition of violent or serious felonies would not violate such principles. (Slip opn. at pp. 13-14) From there, it concluded that “section 1170.125 does not require that, for purposes of the Proposition 36 sentencing procedure, serious and violent felonies must be defined as they were at the time the defendant committed the crime.” (Slip opn. at p. 14) The appellate court, therefore, interpreted the same language in the same statute (section 1170.125) in different ways. (Slip opn. at pp. 13-14) By so doing, the Court of Appeal went astray.

It matters not that the Constitution might permit a different rule to apply for resentencing; the statutes impose the same rule for both purposes. Penal Code section 1170.125, states “for all offenses committed on or after November 7, 2012, all references to existing statutes in sections 1170.12 and 1170.126 are to those sections as they existed on November 7, 2012.” Thus, section 1170.125, as it has from its inception, clarified once again that, for purposes of Three Strikes sentencing, whether it be original sentencing under section 1170.12 or resentencing under section 1170.126, the definitions of violent or serious felonies is controlled by the date of the current offense, because new definitions apply only to crimes that are committed on or after the cut off date. If this is not clear enough, section 1170.126, subdivision (a), requires that the determination of eligibility be made based upon whether a defendant would get a lower sentence under the current versions of sections 667 and 1170.12. And, as even the Court of Appeal noted, petitioner clearly would have had a lower sentence under the current versions of those sections. (Slip op. at p. 13)

That ex post facto considerations may not require this is of no moment. Had the statutes been written to impose different requirements for a recall than for original sentencing, ex post facto may play a part. But, they were not written differently, and basic rules of statutory construction require that the language be read consistently throughout. (Cf. People v. Estrada (1995) 11 Cal.4th 568, 575-576 [because rule implementing constitutional standards was the basis of statutory language, the language had to be construed pursuant to the constitutional interpretation].) “In addition, ‘[t]he language [of a statute] is construed in the context of the statute as a whole and the overall statutory scheme’ [Citation] Thus, when the same word appears in different places within a statutory scheme, courts generally presume the Legislature intended the word to have the same meaning each time it is used.” (People v. Gray (2014) 58 Cal.4th 901, 906.)

In the case of Penal Code section 1170.125, there is not a mere repetition of the same words, it is the single use of the same words in the same context. The Court of Appeal’s construction of section 1170.125 read the same language in that section differently for application to sections 1170.12 and 1170.126. Such a construction is contrary to the basic rules outlined above. Such construction creates an ambiguity that is not in the language.

Assuming that there is such an ambiguity in the statute, the Court of Appeal concluded that the voter’s intent in passing Proposition 36 requires that only the current definitions of violent and serious felonies apply to sentencing recall cases. The appellate court focused on the purpose of the statute to increase public safety and pamphlet arguments promising that “dangerous criminals” will not be released. (Slip op. at pp. 15-17) That interpretation of the statute, however, does not further the overall purpose of the legislation and is not necessary to achieve the purported promise.

The overall purpose and effect of Proposition 36 was to “dilute” the Three Strikes Law so that it would apply to fewer cases. (See People v. Yearwood (2013) 213 Cal.App.4th 161, 167-168.) The plan was to correct a perceived mistake in the initial drafting of the law to preclude it from applying to most current felonies that were not serious or violent. The promoters of the initiative also sought to assure the voters that the new law would not result in the release of truly dangerous felons.

The new law, however, did not, and could not, promise that anybody whose crime is currently defined as serious or violent would not be sentenced to a second strike term. As the Court of Appeal acknowledged, in an original sentencing, anybody who committed his or her offense before that offense was declared to be violent or serious would not be excluded from a second strike sentence if for some reason the conviction was had after the passage of the proposition.

The voter information guide for Proposition 36 stated that the basic purposes for it were to make the punishment fit the crime, save California over $100 million every year, and make room in prison for dangerous felons. As the Court of Appeal noted, the primary focus of the arguments for the proposition was to increase public safety and save money. (Slip opn. at pp. 15-16) In fact, the imposition of this more fitting punishment was the means by which the public's safety was meant to be protected as it would permit prison overcrowding to be addressed by granting earlier release to those who committed less violent crimes and make room for those who had committed more violent crimes. (People v. Yearwood, supra, 213 Cal.App.4th at p. 171; see also Braziel v. Superior Court (2014) 225 Cal.App.4th 933, 946 [ostensible objects to be achieved by Proposition 36 "were to reduce prison overcrowding while keeping dangerous criminals behind bars by allowing courts to resentence 'third strikers whose current offense is nonserious, non-violent.'"].)

Determining eligibility for a sentence recall based upon the definition of violent or serious in effect at the time of the commission a defendant's offense would seemingly render more defendants eligible for a recall of sentence. More recalls better achieve the goal of reducing prison population. A liberal construction of recall eligibility, which merely gets the defendant a hearing on whether his sentence should be reduced, best furthers the purpose of the statute. At the same time, however, Penal Code section 1170.126 gives the sentencing court the ability to deny a recall upon a finding that the defendant poses an unreasonable risk of danger to the public. (See Pen. Code, § 1170.126, subd. (f).) This authority to deny resentencing to those who would create an unreasonable risk to the public is sufficient to achieve the goal of keeping truly dangerous criminals behind bars. Thus, interpreting the statutes to base eligibility on the definition in effect at the time of the commission of the offense being punished is the interpretation most consistent with all of the stated goals of the initiative. As the appellate court recently noted in People v. Machado (2014) ___ Cal.App.4th ___ [B249557 slip opn. p. 12; LEXIS *20], the overall objectives were twofold. “One objective was to continue to imprison for 25 years to life those inmates convicted of serious and violent offenses falling within the Three Strikes law. The second was to save state resources – both money and prison space – without undermining the first objective. The resolution most faithful to the voters' intent is a twofold approach, not a blanket endorsement of the first objective that undercuts the second objective.” (Id. at p. ___ [Slip opn. at p. 12; LEXIS at p. *20] emphasis added .)

Additionally, this Court should not rely on the stated purpose of protecting the public as a basis for interpreting the statute in a manner to achieve the greatest number of third strike sentences. In this regard, this Court’s opinion in People v. Garcia (1999) 20 Cal.4th 490 is instructive. After noting that the overall purpose of the Three Strikes Law was to provide longer sentences for persons who had prior convictions for “strike” offenses, this Court stated, “But our decisions make clear that this purpose is not a mantra that the prosecution can invoke in any Three Strikes case to compel the court to construe the statute so as to impose the longest possible sentence.” (Id. at p. 501; see also People v. Woodhead (1987) 43 Cal.2d 1002, 1011 [“The phrase ‘public safety’ does not constitute a blank check for interpretation of specific statutory language in any manner that would appear to advance the policy objectives advanced by the Attorney General.”) Similarly, the intent to protect the public should not override all other purposes in passing Proposition 36 and mandate that its ameliorative provisions be as narrowly construed as possible.

CONCLUSION

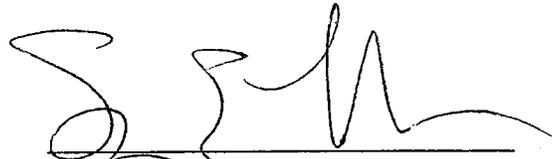

This case presents an important question of interpretation of Penal Code section 1170.126 relating to the eligibility requirements for a sentencing recall. This Court should grant review to clarify the law and explain that the Court of Appeal's interpretations are wrong. Alternatively, this Court should grant review and remand to the Court of Appeal for modification of its opinion to apply the law as outlined herein.

* Pursuant to California Rules of Court, rules 8.1100 and 8.1110, this opinion is certified for publication with the exception of part 2 of the Discussion.

Defendant Timothy Wayne Johnson appeals from an order denying his petition for recall of his sentence pursuant to Penal Code section 1170.126.¹ The superior court found Johnson was ineligible for resentencing because his current offense, attempting to dissuade a witness, is a serious felony. Johnson urges that because dissuading a witness was not defined as a serious felony when he committed his crimes in 1998, he is eligible for resentencing regardless of the fact the offense was later added to section 1192.7's serious felony list. In the published portion of this opinion, we conclude that, for purposes of section 1170.126's resentencing procedure, the determination of whether a defendant's current crime qualifies as a serious or violent felony must be based on whether the crime was so defined as of November 7, 2012, Proposition 36's effective date. Accordingly, Johnson's contention that he is eligible for resentencing under section 1170.126 lacks merit. In the unpublished portion of the opinion, we hold that a trial court's order finding a defendant ineligible for resentencing under section 1170.126 is appealable.

BACKGROUND

In 1998, a jury convicted Johnson of two counts of attempting to dissuade a witness (§ 136.1, subd. (a)(2)). At the time Johnson committed the crimes, attempting to dissuade a witness in violation of section 136.1 was not defined as a serious or violent felony for purposes of the Three Strikes law. Because the jury also found Johnson had suffered three prior convictions for "strike" offenses—robbery (§ 211), residential burglary (§ 459), and assault with personal use of a firearm or infliction of great bodily injury (§ 245, subd. (a)(2))—the trial court sentenced him to a term of 28 years to life pursuant to the Three Strikes law. This court affirmed the judgment in a nonpublished opinion (People v. Johnson (Sept. 15, 2000, B128901)).

Effective November 7, 2012, the electorate enacted Proposition 36, the Three Strikes Reform Act of 2012 (the Act). (People v. Yearwood (2013) 213 Cal.App.4th 161, 167, 169-170; People v. Superior Court (Kaulick) (2013) 215 Cal.App.4th 1279, 1285 (Kaulick)). Among other things, Proposition 36 added section 1170.126, which provides that certain eligible inmates serving indeterminate life sentences under the Three Strikes law may petition the trial courts for reductions in their sentences. (Yearwood, at p. 170.)

On May 10, 2013, Johnson filed a petition for recall of his sentence in the Los Angeles County Superior Court pursuant to section 1170.126. Johnson acknowledged that his current offense, witness intimidation, was at the time of the petition listed as a serious felony, but argued this fact did not make him ineligible for resentencing because the offense had not been listed as a serious or violent felony when he committed the crimes in 1998. On June 12, 2013, the superior court denied Johnson's petition with prejudice, on the ground his current convictions for witness intimidation were serious felonies under section 1192.7, subdivision (c)(37), rendering him ineligible for resentencing. Johnson appeals the trial court's order.

DISCUSSION

1. Proposition 36.

On November 6, 2012, California voters approved Proposition 36, the Act, which amended sections 667 and 1170.12 effective November 7, 2012. (People v. White (2014) 223 Cal.App.4th 512, 517 (White); People v. Yearwood, supra, 213 Cal.App.4th at pp. 167, 169.) Under the Three Strikes law as it existed prior to passage of Proposition 36, a defendant convicted of two prior serious or violent felonies was subject to a 25-years-to-life sentence upon his or her conviction of any additional felony. (White, at p. 517; Yearwood, at pp. 167-168; Kaulick, supra, 215 Cal.App.4th at pp. 1285-1286.) Under amended sections 667 and 1170.12, a defendant who has been convicted of two prior strikes is subject to such a sentence only if the current, third felony is itself a serious or violent felony, or certain enumerated exceptions apply. (White, at p. 517; Kaulick, at p. 1286; Yearwood, at p. 167; §§ 1170.12, subd. (c)(2)(C), 667, subd. (e)(2)(C).)

Proposition 36 also added section 1170.126,² which sets up a resentencing procedure for prisoners presently serving indeterminate terms under the former version of the Three Strikes law, who would not have been sentenced to such terms under ² Section 1170.126 provides in pertinent part: “(a) The resentencing provisions under this section and related statutes are intended to apply exclusively to persons presently serving an indeterminate term of imprisonment pursuant to paragraph (2) of subdivision (e) of Section 667 or paragraph (2) of subdivision (c) of Section 1170.12, whose sentence under this act would not have been an indeterminate life sentence.

“(b) Any person serving an indeterminate term of life imprisonment imposed pursuant to paragraph (2) of subdivision (e) of Section 667 or paragraph (2) of subdivision (c) of Section 1170.12 upon conviction, whether by trial or plea, of a felony or felonies that are not defined as serious and/or violent felonies by subdivision (c) of Section 667.5 or subdivision (c) of Section 1192.7, may file a petition for a recall of sentence, within two years after the effective date of the act that added this section or at a later date upon a showing of good cause, before the trial court that entered the judgment of conviction in his or her case, to request resentencing in accordance with the provisions of subdivision (e) of Section 667, and subdivision (c) of Section 1170.12, as those statutes have been amended by the act that added this section. [¶] . . . [¶]

“(e) An inmate is eligible for resentencing if:

“(1) The inmate is serving an indeterminate term of life imprisonment imposed pursuant to paragraph (2) of subdivision (e) of Section 667 or subdivision (c) of Section 1170.12 for a conviction of a felony or felonies that are not defined as serious and/or violent felonies by subdivision (c) of Section 667.5 or subdivision (c) of Section 1192.7.

“(2) The inmate’s current sentence was not imposed for any of the offenses appearing in clauses (i) to (iii), inclusive, of subparagraph (C) of paragraph (2) of subdivision (e) of Section 667 or clauses (i) to (iii), inclusive, of subparagraph (C) of paragraph (2) of subdivision (c) of Section 1170.12.

“(3) The inmate has no prior convictions for any of the offenses appearing in clause (iv) of subparagraph (C) of paragraph (2) of subdivision (e) of Section 667 or clause (iv) of subparagraph (C) of paragraph (2) of subdivision (c) of Section 1170.12.

“(f) Upon receiving a petition for recall of sentence under this section, the court shall determine whether the petitioner satisfies the criteria in subdivision (e). If the petitioner satisfies the criteria in subdivision (e), the petitioner shall be resentenced pursuant to paragraph (1) of subdivision (e) of Section 667 and paragraph (1) of subdivision (c) of Section 1170.12 unless the court, in its discretion, determines that resentencing the petitioner would pose an unreasonable risk of danger to public safety.”

Proposition 36. (People v. Yearwood, supra, 213 Cal.App.4th at p. 170; White, supra, 223 Cal.App.4th at p. 517.) An eligible prisoner may file a petition to recall his or her sentence in the trial court, and seek resentencing as a second strike offender.

(§ 1170.126, subs. (b), (e); Kaulick, supra, 215 Cal.App.4th at p. 1286; Yearwood, at p. 170.) An inmate is eligible for such resentencing only if none of his or her current offenses are serious or violent felonies, and no other enumerated disqualifying factors apply. (§ 1170.126, subd. (e); Yearwood, at p. 170; White, at pp. 517, 522.)

Resentencing of eligible inmates may nonetheless be refused if the trial court, in its discretion, determines that resentencing would pose an unreasonable risk of danger to public safety. (§ 1170.126, subd. (f); White, at p. 517; Kaulick, at p. 1286; Yearwood, at p. 170.) Thus, the section 1170.126 resentencing procedure involves three determinations: first, the court must determine whether the prisoner is eligible for resentencing; second, the court must determine whether resentencing would pose an unreasonable risk of danger to public safety; and third, if the prisoner is eligible and resentencing would not pose an unreasonable risk of danger, the court must actually resentence the prisoner. (Kaulick, at p. 1299.)

2. Appealability.

The parties disagree about whether the trial court's denial of Johnson's petition is appealable. Johnson asserts that the court's ruling is appealable under section 1237, subdivision (b), as an order made after judgment that affects his substantial rights. The People, on the other hand, argue that because Johnson's current offenses are serious felonies, he had no statutory right to file a petition for recall in the first instance; therefore, the superior court's denial of his petition cannot have implicated his substantial rights. The Courts of Appeal are split on this issue, and our Supreme Court is currently considering it. (Teal v. Superior Court (2013) 217 Cal.App.4th 308, review granted July 31, 2013, S211708; People v. Hurtado (2013) 216 Cal.App.4th 941, review granted July 31, 2013, S212017; People v. Leggett (2013) 219 Cal.App.4th 846, review granted Dec. 18, 2013, S214264; People v. Wortham (2013) 220 Cal.App.4th 1018, review granted Jan. 15, 2014, S214844; In re Martinez (2014) 223 Cal.App.4th 610, review granted May 14, 2014, S216922.)

The right of appeal is statutory, and a judgment or order is not appealable unless expressly made so by statute. (People v. Totari (2002) 28 Cal.4th 876, 881 (Totari); People v. Mazurette (2001) 24 Cal.4th 789, 792.) Section 1170.126 does not specifically address whether a trial court's denial of a petition for recall of sentence under section 1170.126 is appealable. However, section 1237, subdivision (b) provides that a defendant may appeal from "any order made after judgment, affecting the substantial rights of the party." Therefore, Johnson may appeal from the order if it affects his substantial rights.

Totari provides guidance on the question. There, the California Supreme Court concluded a trial court's denial of a statutory section 1016.5 motion to vacate the judgment was appealable. (Totari, supra, 28 Cal.4th at p. 879.) Section 1016.5 requires that a trial court advise a defendant of potential immigration consequences before accepting his or her plea of guilty or no contest, and provides for the remedy of a motion to vacate should the court fail in this duty. The statute does not expressly authorize the appeal of an adverse ruling on such a motion. (Totari, at pp. 879, 881-882.) Accordingly, Totari looked to section 1237 to determine appealability. The court observed that ordinarily, an order is not appealable where it would " 'merely bypass or duplicate appeal from the judgment itself.' [Citation.]" (Totari, at p. 882.) However, that rule did not apply in Totari: "[T]he Legislature has established specific requirements for a motion to vacate under section 1016.5. Once the Legislature has determined that a noncitizen defendant has a substantial right to be given complete advisements and affords defendant a means to obtain relief by way of a statutory postjudgment motion to vacate, the 'no second appeal' rule loses its urgency and a denial order qualifies as an 'order made after judgment, affecting the substantial rights of the party' (§ 1237, subd. (b))." (Totari, at pp. 886-887.)

Similarly, section 1170.126 gives eligible inmates a substantial right to have a trial court reconsider their sentences, and establishes specific requirements for a petition for recall and resentencing. The “no second appeal” rule has no application here; given the retrospective nature of Johnson’s petition (see Kaulick, supra, 215 Cal.App.4th at pp. 1292-1293), denial of the petition obviously could not have been raised on direct appeal. Thus, the superior court’s denial of Johnson’s section 1170.126 petition to recall is an “order made after judgment, affecting the substantial rights of the party” and is appealable pursuant to section 1237, subdivision (b).

The People’s argument that the court’s ruling cannot have affected Johnson’s substantial rights because he was not eligible to file a petition for recall in the first instance puts the cart before the horse. (See Totari, supra, 28 Cal.4th at pp. 884-885.) The crux of Johnson’s appeal is that the trial court erred in finding him ineligible. An erroneous finding of noneligibility clearly would affect Johnson’s substantial rights. Further, contrary to the People’s argument, not all eligibility determinations are straightforward and beyond dispute, as the case in point illustrates. (See generally Kaulick, supra, 215 Cal.App.4th at pp. 1298-1299, fns. 21 & 22; White, supra, 223 Cal.App.4th at p. 519.) Moreover, even if we were to conclude the trial court’s order was nonappealable, in the interests of judicial economy and because the issue Johnson raises is of general concern, we could treat Johnson’s appeal as a petition for writ of habeas corpus. (See People v. Segura (2008) 44 Cal.4th 921, 928, fn. 4; cf. Drum v. Superior Court (2006) 139 Cal.App.4th 845, 852-853.) In light of the foregoing, we review the merits of Johnson’s appeal.

3. Because his current offense is a serious felony, Johnson is ineligible for the section 1170.126 resentencing procedure.

We conclude the superior court correctly denied Johnson’s petition for recall of sentence. Johnson is statutorily ineligible for resentencing because his current offense—attempted witness intimidation in violation of section 136.1—was defined as a serious felony on November 7, 2012, when Proposition 36 went into effect. (§ 1192.7, subdivision (c)(37) and (39).) Johnson is therefore ineligible for resentencing under the Act. (§ 1170.126, subs. (b), (e)(1); Braziel v. Superior Court (2014) 225 Cal.App.4th 933, 946 (Braziel)).

Johnson attempts to circumvent this conclusion by arguing that when he committed his offenses in 1998, witness intimidation was not listed as a serious or violent felony. The offense was not so categorized until Proposition 21, the Gang Violence and Juvenile Crime Prevention Act of 1998, effective March 8, 2000, added witness intimidation in violation of section 136.1 to the list of serious felonies. (§ 1192.7, subd. (c)(37); Manduley v. Superior Court (2002) 27 Cal.4th 537, 574, 577; People v. Neely (2004) 124 Cal.App.4th 1258, 1261-1262, 1264.)³ He points out that section 1170.126 states it is intended “to apply exclusively to persons presently serving an indeterminate term of imprisonment pursuant” to the Three Strikes law, “whose sentence under this act would not have been an indeterminate life sentence.” (§ 1170.126, subd. (a).) He contends he falls within this class of persons, because his current crime was not, at the time he committed it, a serious felony. Therefore, he could not have been sentenced as a “third striker” to an indeterminate life term under the law as amended by Proposition 36. Contrary to Johnson’s argument, we do not read section 1170.126 to require that, for purposes of the Proposition 36 resentencing procedure, the definitions of serious and violent felonies must be considered as they were at the time the crime was committed.

Indeed, our colleagues in Division Seven have recently rejected arguments similar to those Johnson makes here. (Braziel, supra, 225 Cal.App.4th at p. 946.) In Braziel, the defendant's current offenses included making a criminal threat (§ 422). As in the instant matter, that crime was not defined as a serious felony at the time Braziel was convicted, but was added to the list of serious felonies in 2000 by Proposition 21. (Braziel, at p. 939.) Consequently, the trial court denied Braziel's petition for recall of his Three Strikes sentence because the section 422 offense was a serious felony. (Id. at p. 937.) Based on its analysis of the language of section 1170.126, considered in the context of the overall statutory scheme, and evidence of the voters' intent, the Braziel court concluded that "in determining whether an inmate is eligible for recall of his sentence under section 1170.126, the court must use the current, post-Proposition 36 definitions of serious and/or violent felonies, not those definitions in effect at the time of commission of the crimes." (Braziel, at p. 946.) Therefore, Braziel's conviction for making a criminal threat under section 422 rendered him ineligible for recall of his sentence. (Ibid.)

We agree with this conclusion. When interpreting a voter initiative, our primary purpose is to ascertain and effectuate the voters' intent. (People v. Park (2013) 56 Cal.4th 782, 796; People v. Briceno, supra, 34 Cal.4th at p. 459; Robert L. v. Superior Court (2003) 30 Cal.4th 894, 901 (Robert L.); People v. Ringo (2005) 134 Cal.App.4th 870, 883.) We apply the same principles that govern statutory construction. Thus, we look first to the language of the statute, giving the words their ordinary meaning. (Park, at p. 796; Briceno, at p. 459; Robert L., at pp. 900-901.) The plain meaning of the statutory language controls, unless it would lead to absurd results the electorate could not have intended. (People v. Birkett (1999) 21 Cal.4th 226, 231.) The statutory language must be construed in the context of the statute as a whole and the overall statutory scheme. (Briceno, at p. 459; Robert L., at p. 901; Ringo, at p. 883.) When the statutory language is ambiguous, we refer to other indicia of the voters' intent, particularly the analyses and arguments contained in the official ballot pamphlet. (Briceno, at p. 459; Robert L., at p. 901; Ringo, at p. 883.)

Here, the plain language of section 1170.126 makes clear that Johnson's argument lacks merit. When referring to serious or violent felony convictions, section 1170.126 uses the present tense. Subdivision (b) states that any person serving a third strike term for "a felony or felonies that are not defined as serious and/or violent felonies by subdivision (c) of Section 667.5 or subdivision (c) of Section 1192.7, may file a petition for a recall of sentence" (§ 1170.126, subd. (b), italics added.) Similarly, subdivision (e)(1) provides: "An inmate is eligible for resentencing if: [¶] (1) The inmate is serving an indeterminate term of life imprisonment imposed pursuant to paragraph (2) of subdivision (e) of Section 667 or subdivision (c) of Section 1170.12 for a conviction of a felony or felonies that are not defined as serious and/or violent felonies by subdivision (c) of Section 667.5 or subdivision (c) of Section 1192.7." (§ 1170.126, subd. (e)(1), italics added.) The use of the present tense indicates that only persons whose current, commitment offense was not defined as serious or violent on Proposition 36's effective date may file a petition for recall. (Braziel, supra, 225 Cal.App.4th at pp. 940-941 [section 1170.126's use of the present tense in subdivision (e)(1), and use of the past tense coupled with the present participle in subdivision (e)(2), support the conclusion that the current definitions of offenses are determinative].) Stated conversely, if an inmate's current crime was defined as a serious or violent felony on November 7, 2012, he or she is ineligible for section 1170.126's resentencing provisions. " '[The legislative] use of a verb tense is significant in construing statutes.' [Citations.]" (People v. Loewn (1997) 17 Cal.4th 1, 11; In re Valerie A. (2007) 152 Cal.App.4th 987, 1008.) Had the electorate intended for a defendant's resentencing eligibility to hinge on whether his or her current crime was categorized as a serious or violent felony when committed, it could have said so. Section 1170.126 could have been, but was not, drafted to state that a prisoner is ineligible for recall of sentence if his or her current felony was defined as serious or violent when committed.

Johnson urges that sections 1170.126 and 1170.125, read together, “require that the determination of whether a commitment offense is a serious felony be based upon the statutory definition of serious or violent felony at the time of the commission of the commitment offense.” He argues that “from its inception,” section 1170.125 “has required that new designations of serious and violent felonies are to be applied going forward, to offenses committed ‘after’ the effective date of the amendments to the lists of serious or violent felonies.” From this, he infers that an offense cannot be considered a serious felony unless it was so denominated at the time it was committed. To address this contention, we briefly trace the history of section 1170.125.

When the Three Strikes law was enacted in 1994, section 667, subdivision (h) provided: “All references to existing statutes in subdivisions (c) to (g), inclusive, are to statutes as they existed on June 30, 1993.” (Stats. 1994, ch. 12, § 1, p. 75; see Manduley v. Superior Court, supra, 27 Cal.4th at p. 574; People v. Ringo, supra, 134 Cal.App.4th at pp. 883-884.)

As noted, effective March 8, 2000, voters enacted Proposition 21. (People v. Superior Court (Andrades) (2003) 113 Cal.App.4th 817, 824 (Andrades); People v. James (2001) 91 Cal.App.4th 1147, 1149.) Proposition 21 added several offenses to the list of serious and violent felonies, including Johnson’s current crime, dissuading a witness. (People v. Neely, supra, 124 Cal.App.4th at p. 1264; Manduley v. Superior Court, supra, 27 Cal.4th at p. 577; see generally 3 Witkin & Epstein, Cal. Criminal Law (4th ed. 2012) Punishment, § 421, pp. 650-651.) At the same time, Proposition 21 added sections 667.1 and 1170.125. (James, at p. 1149.) As added by Proposition 21, section 667.1 provided: “ ‘Notwithstanding subdivision (h) of Section 667, for all offenses committed on or after the effective date of this act, all references to existing statutes in subdivisions (c) to (g), inclusive, of Section 667, are to those statutes as they existed on the effective date of this act, including amendments made to those statutes by this act.’ ” (James, at p. 1149.) Section 1170.125 provided: “ ‘Notwithstanding Section 2 of Proposition 184, as adopted at the November 8, 1994 General Election, for all offenses committed on or after the effective date of this act, all references to existing statutes in Section 1170.12 are to those statutes as they existed on the effective date of this act, including amendments made to those statutes by this act.’ ” (James, at p. 1149; Couzens & Bigelow, California Three Strikes Sentencing (Rutter Group 2013) § 3:1, p. 3-3.) Thus, Proposition 21 changed the “cutoff” or “lock-in” date in the Three Strikes law to March 8, 2000, allowing certain offenses that were not previously classified as strikes to become so. (Manduley v. Superior Court, supra, at p. 574; People v. Bowden (2002) 102 Cal.App.4th 387, 390-391.)

Thereafter, courts consistently determined whether a prior offense qualifies as a serious or violent felony by reference to the current definitions, not the definitions in place when the prior offense was committed. (Braziel, supra, 225 Cal.App.4th at p. 944.) People v. James, for example, held that “if a defendant’s current offense was committed on or after the effective date of Proposition 21 [March 8, 2000], a determination whether the defendant’s prior conviction was for a serious felony within the meaning of the [T]hree [S]trikes law must be based on the definition of serious felonies in Penal Code section 1192.7, subdivision (c) in effect on March 8, 2000.” (People v. James, supra, 91 Cal.App.4th at p. 1150; People v. Bowden, supra, 102 Cal.App.4th at p. 391; Andrades, supra, 113 Cal.App.4th at pp. 821, 830; Couzens & Bigelow, supra, § 3:3, p. 3-7 [“A prior conviction may be deemed a strike even though the crime was not defined as a serious or violent felony at the time it was incurred, as long as it would so qualify as of the applicable interpretation date”].) This application of Proposition 21’s modification of the cut-off date did not constitute an ex post facto law. (Bowden, at p. 391.)

In 2006, sections 667.1 and 1170.125 were amended again to change the “cut-off” date from March 8, 2000 to September 20, 2006. (Stats. 2006, ch. 337, §§ 29, p. 2634 & 36, pp. 2642-2643; 3 Witkin & Epstein, Cal. Criminal Law, supra, § 421, p. 651; Couzens & Bigelow, supra, § 3:1, at p. 3-3.)

Proposition 36 again amended section 1170.125, changing the cut-off date to November 7, 2012. Section 1170.125 now reads: “Notwithstanding Section 2 of Proposition 184, as adopted at the November 8, 1994, General Election, for all offenses committed on or after November 7, 2012, all references to existing statutes in Sections

1170.12 and 1170.126 are to those sections as they existed on November 7, 2012.” The initiative also amended sections 667.1 and 667, subdivision (h) to reflect the new, November 7, 2012 date. (Couzens & Bigelow, The Amendment of the Three Strikes Sentencing Law (Nov. 2013) p. 24 [<http://www.courts.ca.gov/documents/Three-Strikes-Amendment-Couzens-Bigelow.pdf>] [as of May 23, 2014].)⁴

The “amendment of sections 667.1 and 1170.125 potentially affect[s] the application of Proposition 36 to persons sentenced in an original proceeding under sections 667(b)-(i) and 1170.12, and persons requesting resentencing under section 1170.126.” (Couzens & Bigelow, supra, The Amendment of the Three Strikes Sentencing Law, at p. 24.) As to persons being sentenced in an original proceeding, “[f]or crimes committed prior to November 7, 2012, . . . the applicable law will be determined by the date of the offense. Such an interpretation date is necessary to avoid any ex post facto concerns created by the periodic amendment to sections 667.5 and 1192.7 to add more crimes to the list of serious and violent felonies.” (Couzens & Bigelow, supra, at pp. 24-25.) Thus, if Johnson was being sentenced for his current crime in an original proceeding, whether his current crime is a strike—a serious or violent felony—would be governed by the law in effect as of the date of the offense. (Id. at p. 25.)

The same is not true, however, when a defendant who has already been sentenced petitions for recall and seeks resentencing under section 1170.126. Unlike when considering whether a defendant’s current offense is serious or violent in an original sentencing proceeding, ineligibility for resentencing under the Act does not raise ex post facto concerns. Indeed, Johnson does not advance an ex post facto argument. The ex post facto clauses of the state and federal Constitutions prohibit statutes that retroactively increase the punishment for a crime. (U.S. Const., art. I, § 10; Cal. Const., art. I, § 9; People v. McKee (2010) 47 Cal.4th 1172, 1193; People v. Schoop (2012) 212 Cal.App.4th 457, 475; People v. Palacios (1997) 56 Cal.App.4th 252, 256-257.) Johnson has already been sentenced for his crime. The resentencing procedure does not increase his sentence; it simply gives eligible inmates the opportunity to seek resentencing. (Braziel, supra, 225 Cal.App.4th at p. 944; cf. People v. Osuna (Apr. 24, 2014, F067498) __ Cal.App.4th __ [2014 D.A.R. 5128, 5134-5135; 2014 Cal.App. Lexis 363] ["A finding an inmate is not eligible for resentencing under section 1170.126 does not increase or aggravate that individual's sentence; rather, it leaves him or her subject to the sentence originally imposed"].) Even for eligible inmates, a reduction in sentence is not guaranteed, as resentencing may be denied if the court, in its discretion, finds resentencing will pose an unreasonable public safety risk. (§ 1170.126, subd. (f); White, supra, 223 Cal.App.4th at p. 517.)

Therefore, section 1170.125 does not require that, for purposes of the Proposition 36 resentencing procedure, serious and violent felonies must be defined as they were at the time the defendant committed the crime. As Retired Judge Couzens and Presiding Justice Bigelow explain: "The intent of the amendment to section 1170.125 with . . . respect to the eligibility for resentencing is not entirely clear. . . . [S]ection 1170.125 is amended to provide that 'for all offenses committed on or after November 7, 2012, all references to existing statutes in Sections 1170.12 and 1170.126 are to those sections as they existed on November 7, 2012.' On its face, the amendment with respect to section 1170.126 makes no sense—section 1170.126 only applies to crimes committed prior to November 7, 2012[.] . . . [¶] Likely the intent of the amendment to section 1170.125, when viewed against the opening paragraph to section 1170.126(a), is to limit the ability to request resentencing to those persons who would be eligible for a lower sentence had the crime been committed on or after November 7, 2012. One of the prerequisites to obtaining a resentencing is that the offense which resulted in the life sentence is not itself a serious or violent felony. Sections 667.5(c) and 1192.7(c) defining violent and serious felonies, for the most part, have remained substantially the same since the enactment of the Three Strikes law in 1994. From time to time, however, the lists have been augmented to include new offenses. For example, Proposition 21, enacted March 7, 2000, added section 422, making criminal threats, to the list of serious felonies in section 1192.7(c)(38). It is of no benefit to a defendant sentenced to a 25-[to-]life term for a violation of section 422 prior to 2000 that the crime was not then listed as a serious felony. Based on the objective intent of the amendment to section 1170.125 and the opening paragraph of section 1170.126(a), eligibility for resentencing must be based on the interpretation of statutes as they exist on or after November 7, 2012. In the case of a person convicted of a violation of section 422 prior to March 7, 2000, he or she would not be eligible for resentencing because section 1192.7(c)(38), as it read on November 7, 2012, lists section 422 as a serious felony.” (Couzens & Bigelow, The Amendment of the Three Strikes Sentencing Law, supra, at pp. 25-26, third italics added.) We agree with this analysis.

Moreover, even if sections 1170.125 and 1170.126 are considered ambiguous, an examination of the ballot pamphlet arguments made in support of Proposition 36 is illuminating. Those arguments “were primarily focused on increasing public safety and saving money.” (People v. Yearwood, supra, 213 Cal.App.4th at p. 171.) “Enhancing public safety was a key purpose of the Act.” (Id. at p. 175.) The ballot pamphlet argument in favor of Proposition 36 stated: “Today, dangerous criminals are being released early from prison because jails are overcrowded with nonviolent offenders who pose no risk to the public. Prop. 36 prevents dangerous criminals from being released early. People convicted of shoplifting a pair of socks, stealing bread or baby formula don’t deserve life sentences.” (Ballot Pamphlet, Voter Information Guide, Gen. Elec. (Nov. 6, 2012), rebuttal to argument against Prop. 36, p. 53 (Pamphlet); see also Yearwood, at p. 171.) The arguments in favor of Proposition 36 repeatedly stressed that “dangerous criminals” and persons who had committed serious or violent crimes would remain in prison: “Criminal justice experts and law enforcement leaders carefully crafted Prop. 36 so that truly dangerous criminals will receive no benefits whatsoever from the reform. Repeat criminals will get life in prison for serious or violent third strike crimes.” (Pamphlet, supra, argument in favor of Prop. 36, p. 52.) “Prop. 36 will assure that violent repeat offenders are punished and not released early.” (Ibid.) “The Three Strikes law will continue to punish dangerous career criminals who commit serious violent crimes—keeping them off the streets for 25 years to life.” (Ibid.) “Prop. 36 will keep dangerous criminals off the streets.” (Ibid.) “Prop. 36 will help stop clogging overcrowded prisons with non-violent offenders, so we have room to keep violent felons off the streets.” (Ibid.) The arguments in favor of Proposition 36 also stressed the fiscal benefits of the Act: “Prop. 36 will save taxpayers’ money.” (Ibid.) “Taxpayers could save over $100 million per year” that would otherwise be used to house and care for “non-violent Three Strikes inmates.” (Ibid.; see Yearwood, at p. 171.)

Thus, in enacting Proposition 36 the electorate sought to reduce prison overcrowding and save money, while at the same time protecting public safety by ensuring that persons deemed to pose a safety risk remained incarcerated and did not benefit from the Act. Proposition 36 struck this balance by carefully crafting a set of eligibility requirements for inmates seeking sentence reductions. Chief among those requirements is the noneligibility of persons whose current crime is a serious or violent felony. In other words, the electorate made the judgment that persons whose current offense was defined as a serious or violent felony on November 7, 2012, are deemed to pose too great a risk to public safety to benefit from the resentencing procedure.

Johnson’s crime, witness intimidation, has been defined as a serious felony for purposes of the Three Strikes law since the enactment of Proposition 21; in 2000. Proposition 21, like Proposition 36, was enacted to increase public safety. (People v. James, supra, 91 Cal.App.4th at p. 1151.) By adding witness intimidation to the list of “strike” crimes, the electorate expressed its judgment that commission of the crime demonstrates a defendant’s dangerousness and warrants punishment pursuant to the Three Strikes law. Given that the electorate has concluded witness intimidation is a serious felony, and that persons whose current crimes are serious felonies are too dangerous to be eligible for early release, we do not think it would effectuate the electorate's intent to find Johnson is eligible for resentencing simply because his current crime was not on the serious felony list years ago. In light of the ballot arguments made in favor of Proposition 36, it is clear the electorate did not intend that an inmate whose current crime was defined as serious over 10 years before Proposition 36 was enacted could gain early release. The electorate would have had no reason to suspect that a defendant who committed the offense of witness intimidation before March 8, 2000, should be considered any less dangerous than a defendant who committed the same offense after that date. " '[W]e may not properly interpret the measure in a way that the electorate did not contemplate: the voters should get what they enacted, not more and not less.' [Citation.]" (People v. Park, supra, 56 Cal.4th at p. 796.)
